HAZING IN COLLEGE.—Professor Hitchcook in his Reminiscences of Amherst College, relates a moving metance of death resulting from the barbarous practice of "hazing" in colleges. Referring to an amiable young man who was in the last stages of decline, he

" Having had dark hints that his sickness had originated from the treatment he received as a freshman, I made inquiry, and found the suspicions painfully true. His assailants, whom he did not, and perhaps could not name, had entered his sleeping room and bel drenched his bed with water. But being a stranger in town, and unwilling to confess himself driven from college, he ventured to occupy the dryest part of his wet bed. Up to that night he had never been sick; since that time he had never been well, and now felt himself past recovery. "Do you now, But feel, said, I, as if you could forgive those a who murdered you? For a moment I perceived there was a struggle in his feeling, but ase at length he replied : 'Yes. I lorgive them.' He had cheerfully given up all his worldly , prospects, but I did not wonder that he should reluctate when asked to pardon the authors of all his calamities; for I am afraid that my own heart even at last had less of a forgiving spirit than his. It was more than I could bear to see this Christian, talented young man, who had looked forward to the are ministry, now on a bed of death solely us the result of the brutal assault of those who probvas ably would prove only curses to the world."
